Wedded Yet Strangers.

A strange life story with a remarkable climax ended in Chicago yesterday, when James Hutchins, a well-to-do resident of that city, was buried.

Mr. Hutchins' death occurred just as the night was closing on Saturday. The death-bed scene in his comfortable home was an extraordinary one.

The dying man had not spoken a word to his wife in twelve years, and for that time they had occupied separate rooms.

He was a singular and obstinate man. Dr. Parsons told him he had only a few hours to live.

Mrs. Hutchins was crying, and the dying man, with open eyes, watched her. With a sudden impulse of a love that had survived the years of cruel treatment, Mrs. Hutchins threw her arms around her husband's neck, kissed him fondly, and begged him to speak to her once, to break, before he died, the silence of a dozen years. There was a struggle apparent in his countenance. His lips opened as if to speak, but only an inarticulate sound came from them. His face grew set and stern again. He slightly repulsed her and was taken with a spasm of coughing.

He asked the doctor for a drink of water. Mrs. Hutchins made no further attempts to a reconciliation, and in a half hour her husband died.

The story of Mrs. Hutchins' peculiar treatment has been a subject for talk and wonder of the neighbors. They were married thirty years ago in England. He was a handsome foot soldier of the British army, and she was a friend of his mother. They came to the town of Leesixteen years ago, and he got work with the Union Stock Yards Company. He met Henry Barroff, and as fellow workmen they became strong friends, and Barroff, who was unmarried, used to visit Hutchins many a time at his house. One evening Barroff dropped in before Hutchins had returned from his work.

He sat down and presently Hutchins came in.
"Hello, Barroff, how are you?" said he.

"How d'ye do, Jim," said Barroff, and the conversation proceeded socially for an hour or two, when Barroff went home.

As soon as the door closed behind him, Hutchins charged his wife with infidelity.
He broke into a frightful passion. He would hear no reply or explanation, and ended the scene by locking himself up in another room.

Mrs. Hutchins could not understand it.
Their married life had been happy until this time, and had been blessed by a fine boy.

She got supper, tried her tears, knocked on her husband's door, and told him supper was ready. He ate his meal without a word, and in sudden silence smoked his pipe until bedtime. She made one or two attempts to say something without avail. He retired to his bedroom, while she spent the night in another room. In the morning it was the same way. He ate his breakfast and went to work as deaf as a post. This life went on for days and weeks, and years, he never saying a word to her. Sometimes he wrote his requests on a piece of paper. Sometimes she called in a neighbor's child, and talked to him through the child. He always spoke pleasantly on these occasions, but frowned and became stern if she ventured to address him directly. He made her an allowance of $25 a month for the household expenses and her own clothes.

Hutchins was a provident, thrifty man, and accumulated money, bought houses and lots, and made loans. He was fifty-five years old when he died, and during recent years he had not worked. His wife, through their boy, asked for more money than twenty five dollars a month. Hutchins grew violent and threw ten dollars at her. She never asked him for money again. Mrs.
Hutchins, the neighbors say, used to cry a great deal, and two or three times her husband was seen to weep violently when he thought he was not observed. But of late years both have gone on in a matter of fact way. Their son married and went West three or four years ago. Their solitary life went on as before until a week ago, when Hutchins was taken ill. Dr. Parsons said he had the typhoid fever. Mrs. Hutchins cared for him, gave him medicine, and performed all the offices of the sick chamber.

He never spoke to her, and accepted her attentions in the same silence that he had observed for twelve years. Mrs. Hutchins has no idea of what property was left or what money was loaned. The only business she did was once in a while to collect rent for her husband and give receipts signed by him.
